Background

Global change has become a predominant issue to be addressed by not all nations in the world. There are revolutionary shifts from individual level of our everyday lives to national and international levels. Disruption era is undeniable in every sector of life, as indicated by the rapid growth of information technology and the adoption of various digital devices. This condition also applies to public expectation. Public expectation increases along with the development of change in the community. Through technology, public expect everything easier, cheaper, and faster. On the other hand, available resources are increasingly limited.

Within the dynamic circumstance, it is very important to the government authorities around the world to identify the most effective strategy to ensure continuous improvement of public expectation. Government authorities have endless duties to accommodate growing public expectation with the unprecedented global change society. Global change cannot be understood, let alone handled wisely, in the absence of practical and theoretical contributions from the social sciences. Global changing society has become an unprecedented challenge for Public Administration due to its complexity that enforces public administration to inevitably follow development and takes appropriate steps further. Public Administration also could bridge between public expectation and government's ability to meet their expectation.

According to McKinsey Global Institute (2019), the 21st century will be characterized by a pivot toward Asia. Asia is on track to top 50% of World GDP by 2040 and drive 40% of the World's consumption, representing a real shift in the world center of gravity. This future condition could be challenges and opportunities for Asia, thus Public Administration through digital revolution will play a very important role in dealing with the future.

The next wave of digital governance presents an historic opportunity to fundamentally redesign how government operates, how and what the public sector provides, and ultimately how government interact and engage with their citizen (Institute on Governance, 2017). Through digital governance, all systems will be connected and big data will be useful as a backbone of many systems and applications. Digital Governance will help face problems effectively and efficient. The opportunity of digital development offer to make Asia better to reach the future. It is a challenge how public administration produce a better public policy. The public policy should be adaptive and responsive to face the global change that continues develop over the times. Also, global governance will correlate between one governance to another because in the future global issues will influence almost every governance. Connection inter-governance will be more attractive and collaborative in digital era.

To discuss further about the global change issues, Indonesian Association for Public Administration (IAPA) and Asian Group for Public Administration (AGPA) present Joint Annual Conference 2019 entitled “Strengthening the Role of Public Administration in the Global Changing Society: Public Sector Reform and Digital Transformation in Asia”. This conference invites scholars, researcher, policy maker, professional manager, and other related stakeholder that contribute to these contemporary issues in global change, public administration, and digital transformation.
